1   One stylesheet, two pages

Create a single stylesheet called `a.css`. Using that single stylesheet (with no embedded CSS), create two `.html` files:

index.html — contains links to `movies.html` and `travel.html`

movies.html — contains a list of your top 5 favourite movies. Each movie should have a brief (1–3 sentence) description of why you like it. You must include at least one foreign movie (define that as you wish) and at least one domestic movie. Foreign movies titles should be styled differently (e.g., italicized).

travel.html — contains a list of your top 5 travel destinations. You must include at least one foreign/international location and at least one local/domestic location. Foreign/international locations should be styled differently.

(If you don't watch that many movies or travel much, either email me for another idea or just make something up. You're not being marked on how truthful this content is.)

Both pages must use the same stylesheet and have a consistent and pleasant visual style.

2   A second stylesheet

Make a second stylesheet `b.css` that will work with your 2 `.html` files. Without changing the HTML (except for the `<link>`), the new stylesheet should work with both HTML files.

As compared to your first stylesheet, your second stylesheet should:

- Use a different colour scheme. If your first sheet had a light background, this one should have a dark background, and vice versa.

- Should stylelize foreign entries differently. E.g., if the first stylesheet used italics, this one could use underline.

3   Submission

Upload a `.zip` file which contains `a.css`, `b.css`, `index.html`, `movies.html` and `travel.html`
